

Machines generate ideas from many points of view. None are truly their own. Humans can consider many views, but in the end, live inside just one. This is one of those human points of view...

SONG

"Mo-Net de Xa-Nia, Lasagna" (Do, Can, Will You Understand?)

Artist: Sekrett Scilensce

"I like the elegance about the whole thing. Seems like lots of other people speak from anger that's like entitled or somethin like that or like sayin that they deserve it more if you feel me? But I heard this and just felt like yea maybe you get picked over but you said what you needed to but like inside a song. That's really a better way at least to me."

– Xandra (Comment #4747)

It's hard to know much at all. What's real? Which stories were planted? Billboard charts... pay-to-play... the machine hums louder than most realize. People buy into ideas that were never truly theirs. "Art is subjective," they say — but so is the how and why of what gets told, sold, and stamped as acceptable, shaping the pulse of society.

We could fight those battles — and maybe we will. But tonight, we're pouring it out straight from the heart.
